Brief summery of events:

We set off eagerly in the wrong direction before being herded back on to the trail. Crackle deliberately splashed fellow hashers in the first muddy puddle she could find. They haven't yet got their revenge, but they will. Pherognomes shoes finally got a proper coating of trail mud and apparently felt all the better for it.
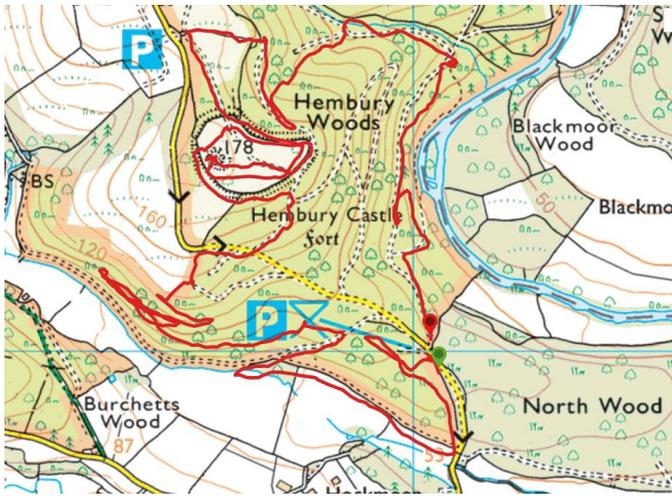

The trail continued with a little bit of down before an impossible amount of up. There were checks and many check backs, even a few optional freebie checkbacks. The sawdust continued with yet more up eventually reaching the RG with an interesting Wanksy piece. JT offered around his sweaty buttons and sour sweets before sending us off down a short hill before yet more up.

The shorts decided to take a long cut for a bit of extra mileage. Perhaps the ice rink mud wasn't enough of a challenge on its own. Eventually they found the OH and dug deep with the thought of beer and chips on their minds.

On arrival at the Dartbridge Inn the hungry Hashers were greeted with the sad news that the kitchen had closed early. NO CHIPS! Somehow Wimpout had precured Wimpers a full plate of Lasagne and chips which he had to eat with an audience of circling Seagulls.

Bog Snaffler made us all jealous with his tales of winter sunshine and we substituted crisps for chips.

Apparently there have been 100 Hashes since the last visit to Hembury Woods, maybe that's why I had no idea where I was all run.
